

Online Teaching and Learning Colloquia

Reflections on Teaching Reflections on Learning

Presented by the TE150-online team

*Matthew J. Koehler, Punya Mishra
& the grad instructors who actually make it work*

Over the past four semesters we have been teaching a fully online version of TE150, Reflections on Learning. Designing and teaching this course has been a collaborative effort between faculty, graduate students and programmers. In this presentation we will discuss the course, our use of diverse technologies and pedagogies, including games, dynamic discussion forums, social networking, magic tricks and popular film. We will also present information on how students have responded to this format and what we have learned in the process.

A light lunch will be served.

Thursday,
January 22
12:00 – 1:30 p.m.
252 Erickson Hall

Co-Sponsored by MA-APPC, Center for Teaching and Technology, and the Center for the Scholarship of Teaching

These colloquia will be offered to share with the COE community models of effective online teaching and learning, as well as explore issues and challenges with learning and teaching in online environments. One goal of these colloquia experiences is to encourage communities of practice around online teaching within the College of Education, between those experienced in online teaching, those who are just developing or creating a new practice of online teaching, and those who are learning in online environments.
